Excerpt: ... The Station stated the conditions needed to get the bounty and showed the results of the bounty on maple sugar in 1892, indicating that seven-eighths of the sugar made by those registered received bounty, the receipts that year exceeding $35,000. W. W. C. B. 25 (1891); W. W. C. & J. L. H. B. 30 (1892) (out of print). The detection of adulteration in maple sugar and syrup. The chemical identity of the maple, cane and beet sugars has been deemed a bar to successful attempts to differentiate between them. Recently evolved methods, however, enable one to tell both the character and extent of sophistication, to which end the investigations at this Station have to no small degree contributed. The scheme outlined involves the determination of total, soluble and insoluble ash contents; the alkalinity of each; the ratio of insoluble to soluble ash; the alkalinity of one gram each of soluble and insoluble ash; the ratio of one to the other; the percentage Of the total ash soluble; the determination of the lead subacetate precipitate, and of the so-called malic acid value. These various determinations and their application to sundry pure and adulterated products of diverse sorts are discussed, together with general statements as to relationship of aroma, flavor, color, ash appearance, sulphate contents, etc., to the detection of adulteration. The articles are technical in character and do not admit of condensation. C. H. J. 17:446-457 (1904); 18:315-339 (1905). CHEMISTRY Composition of mushrooms. Analyses of nine natural growing mushrooms with comments thereon. C. H. J. 16:196-197 (1903). Analyses of infant foods. Analyses of six proprietary infant foods and comments thereon. C. H. J. 16:197-198 (1903). On the quantitative separation of maltose and lactose. A meth...
