

The Longest Reignation in History

Synopsis of: The Longest Resignation in History Enough is enough! The first three words I typed when the monotony of my latest office based planning role became intolerable. Not that the work itself was any different to what I was accustomed, but rather that there simply wasn't enough of it to keep me industrious. I began to wonder, was I the only one? Everyone else looks so damn busy all the time, could I really be the only one in here with absolutely nothing to do? So without anything better to do I continued typing, writing about the very place that was propelling me rapidly toward psychosis. There was a difference now though, as I wrote things seemed to change. I began to observe the office and the characters within it from an entirely different perspective and as I did, something amazing happened, the smile returned to my face! The more I wrote about the place I formerly couldn't wait to get out of every day, the more I loved being there. I loved it so much that I started to think about all the other places I'd previously hated working and now, I wanted to return. I began to remember all the characters I'd met, the ones we all used to say that: You could write a book about them. So I did, I began writing that book. As I reminisced, I began to realize that every office has a Jobsworth Dweeb and that everyone's met a Hero Boss like mine at one time or other, intent on saving all around them from certain doom. We've all met an exaggerator like the swinger Big Frank although I doubt most will have claimed to be fluent in Dutch. Then there's others like the thirty stone, self-proclaimed, English Lawn Tennis Association champ, The Dark Lord who must surely be unique as was Wolverine, the habit-laden noise maker who I laughed at (not with) so much during one meeting that I let out a bit of wee. The days just got better and better, flying by in fact, as the formerly lethargic mornings began to be replaced with genuinely enthusiastic ones. I was no longer waiting for the alarm before springing out of bed, there was finally a purpose for me in the office, albeit not the one I was paid for, but a purpose nonetheless! Then, after my epiphany, it all started to go wrong when they began to give me work to do, more and more of it, how dare they make me earn my living? I thought. In fact, they gave me so much darn work that I couldnt write anymore and my smile returned to a gloomy sulk. Life had changed forever and I was no longer capable of enduring the tedious life of an office worker. I needed to go and write, about absolutely anything, and so I handed Hero Boss my resignation in the form of a 200+ page book where within he plays a cameo role. I printed it on the companys paper using their ink and on the last line of the last page I had typed the final three words. Enough is enough!
