Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: ...405 measures regarding labor were passed, and not all of the legislatures were working that year.<sup>1</sup> But though many of our commonwealths are far advanced and stand on a par with the best states of Europe with regard to certain matters, we find that even adequate laws for the protection of the labor of children are still lacking in many of the States, laws for the protection of the labor of women are often subject to attack and nullification on constitutional grounds. When we look at the administration of these laws, we are obliged to confess that very frequently they are not executed by experts, but that the poison of the spoils system still neutralizes, in far too many cases, the good that laws might otherwise accomplish. i Mass. Labor Bull., March-April, 1908, p. 69. While in the world at large labor legislation has already passed beyond the national stage and has now become the subject of international treaties, we are still struggling with a lack of uniformity both in lawgiving and in law-enforcing within the limits of a single country. We are not even able to command satisfactory information with regard to industrial accidents or industrial diseases in order to guide future legislation. So simple a matter as the registration of vital statistics is still in such a state of chaos that Congress has been obliged to request the States to introduce registers and has ordered a model law drawn up for their guidance. If we look at the matter in all frankness we must acknowledge that, while our industries are noted throughout the world for the inventiveness, the mechanical skill, the business talent which they command, and while we have every reason to be proud of our educational system and of our standing in international relations, we have apparently overlooked...
